

THE PRINCE OF WALES.

MORE ENTHUSIASM AND CEREMONY.

THE FREEMASONS ON THEIR DIGNITY.

ANTICIPATED RIOT IN TORONTO

The Prince Slides Down Hill on a Raft.

Scenes at Night—A Canoe Torchlight Procession.

Special Despatches to the Herald.

OTTAWA, Sept. 3, 1860.

At eleven o'clock on Saturday morning the Prince of Wales left the Victoria Hotel, where he was staying, and proceeded to lay the foundation stone of the new Parliament building. Over the entrance to the grounds, which were enclosed, a handsome Gothic arch was erected. A gigantic crown was placed over the stone that was to be laid.

On the round open space there were tiers of seats containing several thousand spectators. The central space was reserved for the Prince and suite, and a few privileged persons, including the members of the press. The seats leading to the spot were lined with volunteers, heads of lumbermen in scarlet skirts, Orange societies from the country, mounted, and clad in Orange frocks, and heads of music.

The Prince and suite, the government officials, the architect, contractors, clerk of the work, etc., took positions around the stone. Rev. Dr. Adamson, Chaplain of the Legislative Council, offered up a prayer.

The stone is of beautiful white Canadian marble, with the simple inscription, "Laid by the Prince of Wales, September 1, 1860." Under the stone there is a hollow, in which is placed a bottle containing a parchment record of the ceremony, and a number of the coins of Great Britain and Canada.

When the mortar had been spread around the stone, the Prince gave the finishing touch to it with a silver trowel. The stone was then lowered to the place assigned for it, examined with the plumb and level, and pronounced "duly laid." The crowd then gave three rousing cheers for the Queen, three for the Prince, and three for the Governor General.

A deputation of a Masonic society of the State of New York were on hand to take part in the ceremony of laying the corner stone, and to the astonishment of all no Masons were present. It appears that the Duke of Newcastle and the Hon. John Rose refused the Masons the privilege of laying the stone, after the Prince, with their peculiar ornaments. The consequence was that the Masons unanimously refused to have anything to do with the affair.

As the Masons are very strong in Canada and in the House of Parliament a disturbance is expected, and a vote of censure will surely be passed by both houses during the present session.

It seems as if everywhere the Prince goes he does something to create a disturbance between religious, or parties of some other kind.

At Toronto the Orange Society intend creating an arch and appearing in the procession. The Roman Catholics hold a mass meeting on Thursday, and petitioned the Mayor to stop the procession. A riot is expected there, if nothing is done by either party.

The following is the Prince's reply to the Mayor's address, which, as the City Clerk carried it in his pocket, could not be read till the eve—

"I thank you sincerely for this address, and I request you to convey to the citizens whom you represent the expression of my gratitude for the very kind and cordial reception which I have received here, and the warm wishes which they have presented me. In this city, as in every other, I am about to lay the first stone of a building in which will be the deliberations of the Parliament of Canada will be held, and from which will emanate the laws which are to govern the great and free people of this province, and the civilization and progress of the continent, and the welfare of the people of the great empire of which this colony forms an integral and most important portion. I do not doubt that, with its increase of population, and the growth of its commerce, and the wealth of the country of which it is now the capital, and will justify the selection which has been made of this site for the seat of government.

The Prince took very much interest in the address, and his countenance being again followed by a crowd.

After dinner he went to the side of the Chaudiere Falls, where by three wooden inclined planes rafts are conveyed from Chaudiere Lake down to Ottawa river, a distance of sixty feet.

The Prince and suite embarked on a raft and went down the slide, the people shouting lustily.

Here an immense arch was constructed entirely of wood, without rail, and beautifully decorated. It was very high, unique and elegant. The Prince then entered a large and rowed down the river to see the regatta. There was a fine and spirited display of lumbermen's skill.

In the evening the whole city was beautifully illuminated. A large procession of canoes by torchlight took place on the river, and a band called the "Phrygians," dressed in the costume of different periods, like the Romans of Gaul, paraded through the town on horseback, bearing torches.

There is little to be recorded of the Prince's movements yesterday. He went to Christ Church, where he was crowded with people, though they hardly knew him in plain clothes. Thinking, no doubt, that he lives and sleeps in uniform. Each of the suite put a merriment on the place. The old custom newly died for joy, and the trustees of erecting a new church from the proceeds. No money was served out in Canada before.

After service the Prince and suite, descending their carriage, went back to the hotel, followed by a gang of boys, boys and women, commencing loudly at his appearance, much to the annoyance of the Prince.

He held dinner with a party of forty. Breakfast, the Prince, had great difficulty in getting provisions enough, and the Prince, being told that it would take half an hour to get dinner ready, and that an American could get it in a quarter of an hour if he pleased. I believe the Prince always breakfasts with a small party of four or five of the principal members of the suite.

In the afternoon the Prince drove with the Hon. Mr. McKay to his country seat where he took lunch. Mr. McKay is a large mill owner here. The carriage was followed by troops of police. The Duke of Newcastle and St. Germaine also walked out, and were followed by crowds.

The people seem to be all out of doors, riding, driving and walking about. Ladies and children were sitting along the road where the Prince passed, and the Victoria Hotel, where the Prince stopped, was surrounded all day by crowds, sitting opposite on the moors, intently watching the house.

The Prince left here at eight o'clock, in an open carriage, for the little village of Aylmer, on route for Kingston. He sat at the open window for an hour before starting, stared at by a large throng. He also inspected the volunteer troops before the hotel, walking up, down and between the ranks. To-night he spends at Brockville.

ANNALS OF THE PRINCE AT BROCKVILLE.

BROCKVILLE, C. W., Sept. 3, 1860.

The Earl of Devon and some of the Prince's suite arrived here by the regular train this afternoon. They occupied a separate car, while the other were with

THE BRECKINRIDGE BARBECUE.

Assembled in the Hands of the Democracy—Unbrag of the Old Line Whigs—The Contest Between Breckinridge and Bell—The Union Ticket—Douglas' Strength—Personal Popularity of Breckinridge—Decides to Take the Stamp—Kentuckians Looking Up—The Points of Mr. Breckinridge's Fortcoming—Special Despatch to the New York Herald.

LEXINGTON, Ky., Sept. 3, 1860.

The Committee on Arrangements, of which John R. Wiley is Chairman, had just decided where the barbecue would be held. The Fair ground, half a mile out on Mulberry street, was considered the most desirable location, both on account of its proximity to the town and its excellent view of the river. It was, however, a long and tedious journey, where the speaker could be heard by a much larger audience than on level ground. The proprietors, however, a joint stock company, through their directors, refused all offers of the committee, for the reason that they did not wish the ground to be used for political purposes; and further, that it would interfere with their arrangements for the approaching fair to be held next week.

Their decision has given much umbrage to the friends of Mr. Breckinridge, who were willing to pay any price demanded, and consider that, being a public ground, it should be open to all parties. In answer to the first objection, they say that Mr. Clay on one occasion addressed a meeting there, and they hesitate not to allege that political feeling is at the bottom of the refusal.

Failing to obtain the Fair ground, the committee turned their attention to Ashland, made classic ground at the home of the gifted Henry Clay. This beautiful retreat, which the engraver, painter and photographer have made so familiar to the eyes of every American as to need no description, is situated about a mile and a half from the town; it is at present owned by Hon. James Clay, who, now a democrat, promptly met the wishes of the committee by granting the use of the woodland south of the house, the same where a barbecue was given to Henry Clay on his election to Congress in 1837. But, alas for him who attempts to please all. The old line Whigs take much offense at this arrangement. They look upon it as little short of sacrilege to permit a democratic gathering on a spot sacred to the memory of their great leader. I am informed that many who had a curiosity to hear Mr. Breckinridge refused to attend for this reason. As might be anticipated, political feeling runs high just at present, and on every corner I meet little groups discussing the prospects of Breckinridge and the Bell-Everett ticket.

The contest in this State will be between these parties, and the Douglas interest is only regarded as a how far it will influence the result between the others. In that view the contest is important; and the greater number with whom I have conversed think that Douglas' strength deduced from the democratic vote will throw the election into the hands of the Union party.

In the last gubernatorial election the united democracy beat the opposition by a majority of only one or ten thousand. Now, even the friends of Breckinridge acknowledge that Douglas can get twenty thousand votes in the State, principally from the border towns. The large defection from the democratic strength gives a majority to the Union party, who anticipate that the large opposition vote on the occasion will not only not be diminished, but will be increased in favor of Bell and Everett; for, say they, many men who, by reason of the protective principles of the opposition candidates, voted the democratic ticket, find in the division of the democratic party a good reason to return.

As a verification of what I stated in my last letter of the strength of the Union party in the eastern portion of this State, I give the result of a canvass made by a gentleman in the morning train from Lexington to Lexington—Bell, 42; Breckinridge, 31; Douglas, 4; Lincoln, 4. Too much reliance is not to be placed on such facts, of course, but they are an indication of which way the political wind blows.

Supporters of Mr. Breckinridge, who become more and more numerous and more energetic in the interior and southern counties, reckon upon a large accession to Mr. Breckinridge from the opposition ranks and many conversions from Douglas. The amount of Omate over McCarthy, which has done so much to weaken their prestige in other States, they regard as no just criticism. McCarthy, they say, was a young man, not well known, while Omate had been long known to the democratic party. The time in which to canvass was very short, and there were thousands of good Breckinridge men who either did not know McCarthy was in the field or failed to vote on that occasion. They count largely on the popularity of Mr. Breckinridge in rallying men from every side to his support, and certainly, from what I can see, no man was more blessed with an extensive personal friendship. They rally round him with an enthusiasm and ardor which augurs strongly in favor of the man who can inspire such devotion. Indeed, it is at his urgent solicitation that he has overcome his reluctance to take part in the Presidential canvass, and consented to speak. They consider such a course called for by the numerous and persistent attacks made upon him, and especially to refute the charge of disunion sentiments, which reflects not only upon himself, but upon the political organization that sustains him; for their wishes in this he has yielded, but he has not yet indicated a consent to the further request that he should appear personally in five or six principal districts of the State. They are confident that such a personal popularity and great force as a public speaker, that his appearance on the stump would insure his election beyond a doubt.

It is not the habit of Mr. Breckinridge to prepare his speeches beforehand. I can, however, gather from reliable sources that after explaining the reasons for his taking an active part in the Presidential canvass, he will deliver the general address against him, in reply to the charge of disunion, and having submitted to the office of President, he will make a comprehensive statement, showing that he owned the claims of Mr. Galt, never allowing his own name to come in competition with him, and that it was only after the disruption occurred he felt himself called upon by every obligation of honor and principle to accept the nomination. He will charge upon the Whig Convention that it stands forth prominently in history as having violated the fundamental principle of representation, and as not only void of the spirit of justice, but not even clothed with the forms of regularity. The charge that he signed a petition for the pardon of John Brown he will denounce as wholly untrue. As to the assertion that he did not support Cass and Butler in the canvass of 1856, he will show that he returned from Mexico about the middle of that canvass, ordered into Kentucky, and took passage ship west to his old home in Kentucky, where he was warmly welcomed by his friends. He will show that he was in Kentucky, was a Kentuckian, his old commander and friend, in regard to the rumor extensively circulated that he was in favor of the abolition of slavery in Kentucky, was an emancipationist, and voted for an emancipationist candidate in 1849, can only account for it by supposing that some honest people may possibly have confounded him with the Rev. Robert G. Breckinridge, in the same county. One of the most surprising charges to Mr. B. is, that he sympathizes with the principles and purposes of the Know Nothing organization. This he will refute by showing that he was almost the first person in the House of Representatives, in the Congress, who proclaimed his hostility to the order, and that when on his return to Kentucky, in the spring of 1856, after the adjournment of Congress, he found it had taken deep root in the State, he arrayed himself against it in many public speeches in various parts of the State. The representation that he is at any time vitiated the sentiment that he would make a political distinction between a person of his own religious belief and another, or between a native born and adopted citizen, by denouncing an utterly untrue. Then, as to the accusation that he and the organization he represents have abandoned the positions which they occupied in 1854 and 1856, upon the Territorial question, he will meet first, by showing that it is based upon reports of his speeches totally incorrect. He emphatically denies that he ever entertained or uttered the opinion that a Territorial Legislature possessed the power to exclude slave property pending the Territorial question.

THE PRINCE OF WALES.

MORE ENTHUSIASM AND CEREMONY.

THE FREEMASONS ON THEIR DIGNITY.

ANTICIPATED RIOT IN TORONTO

The Prince Slides Down Hill on a Raft.

Scenes at Night—A Canoe Torchlight Procession.

Special Despatches to the Herald.

OTTAWA, Sept. 3, 1860.

At eleven o'clock on Saturday morning the Prince of Wales left the Victoria Hotel, where he was staying, and proceeded to lay the foundation stone of the new Parliament building. Over the entrance to the grounds, which were enclosed, a handsome Gothic arch was erected. A gigantic crown was placed over the stone that was to be laid.

On the round open space there were tiers of seats containing several thousand spectators. The central space was reserved for the Prince and suite, and a few privileged persons, including the members of the press. The seats leading to the spot were lined with volunteers, heads of lumbermen in scarlet skirts, Orange societies from the country, mounted, and clad in Orange frocks, and heads of music.

The Prince and suite, the government officials, the architect, contractors, clerk of the work, etc., took positions around the stone. Rev. Dr. Adamson, Chaplain of the Legislative Council, offered up a prayer.

The stone is of beautiful white Canadian marble, with the simple inscription, "Laid by the Prince of Wales, September 1, 1860." Under the stone there is a hollow, in which is placed a bottle containing a parchment record of the ceremony, and a number of the coins of Great Britain and Canada.

When the mortar had been spread around the stone, the Prince gave the finishing touch to it with a silver trowel. The stone was then lowered to the place assigned for it, examined with the plumb and level, and pronounced "duly laid." The crowd then gave three rousing cheers for the Queen, three for the Prince, and three for the Governor General.

A deputation of a Masonic society of the State of New York were on hand to take part in the ceremony of laying the corner stone, and to the astonishment of all no Masons were present. It appears that the Duke of Newcastle and the Hon. John Rose refused the Masons the privilege of laying the stone, after the Prince, with their peculiar ornaments. The consequence was that the Masons unanimously refused to have anything to do with the affair.

As the Masons are very strong in Canada and in the House of Parliament a disturbance is expected, and a vote of censure will surely be passed by both houses during the present session.

It seems as if everywhere the Prince goes he does something to create a disturbance between religious, or parties of some other kind.

At Toronto the Orange Society intend creating an arch and appearing in the procession. The Roman Catholics hold a mass meeting on Thursday, and petitioned the Mayor to stop the procession. A riot is expected there, if nothing is done by either party.

The following is the Prince's reply to the Mayor's address, which, as the City Clerk carried it in his pocket, could not be read till the eve—

"I thank you sincerely for this address, and I request you to convey to the citizens whom you represent the expression of my gratitude for the very kind and cordial reception which I have received here, and the warm wishes which they have presented me. In this city, as in every other, I am about to lay the first stone of a building in which will be the deliberations of the Parliament of Canada will be held, and from which will emanate the laws which are to govern the great and free people of this province, and the civilization and progress of the continent, and the welfare of the people of the great empire of which this colony forms an integral and most important portion. I do not doubt that, with its increase of population, and the growth of its commerce, and the wealth of the country of which it is now the capital, and will justify the selection which has been made of this site for the seat of government.

The Prince took very much interest in the address, and his countenance being again followed by a crowd.

After dinner he went to the side of the Chaudiere Falls, where by three wooden inclined planes rafts are conveyed from Chaudiere Lake down to Ottawa river, a distance of sixty feet.

The Prince and suite embarked on a raft and went down the slide, the people shouting lustily.

Here an immense arch was constructed entirely of wood, without rail, and beautifully decorated. It was very high, unique and elegant. The Prince then entered a large and rowed down the river to see the regatta. There was a fine and spirited display of lumbermen's skill.

In the evening the whole city was beautifully illuminated. A large procession of canoes by torchlight took place on the river, and a band called the "Phrygians," dressed in the costume of different periods, like the Romans of Gaul, paraded through the town on horseback, bearing torches.

There is little to be recorded of the Prince's movements yesterday. He went to Christ Church, where he was crowded with people, though they hardly knew him in plain clothes. Thinking, no doubt, that he lives and sleeps in uniform. Each of the suite put a merriment on the place. The old custom newly died for joy, and the trustees of erecting a new church from the proceeds. No money was served out in Canada before.

After service the Prince and suite, descending their carriage, went back to the hotel, followed by a gang of boys, boys and women, commencing loudly at his appearance, much to the annoyance of the Prince.

He held dinner with a party of forty. Breakfast, the Prince, had great difficulty in getting provisions enough, and the Prince, being told that it would take half an hour to get dinner ready, and that an American could get it in a quarter of an hour if he pleased. I believe the Prince always breakfasts with a small party of four or five of the principal members of the suite.

In the afternoon the Prince drove with the Hon. Mr. McKay to his country seat where he took lunch. Mr. McKay is a large mill owner here. The carriage was followed by troops of police. The Duke of Newcastle and St. Germaine also walked out, and were followed by crowds.

The people seem to be all out of doors, riding, driving and walking about. Ladies and children were sitting along the road where the Prince passed, and the Victoria Hotel, where the Prince stopped, was surrounded all day by crowds, sitting opposite on the moors, intently watching the house.

The Prince left here at eight o'clock, in an open carriage, for the little village of Aylmer, on route for Kingston. He sat at the open window for an hour before starting, stared at by a large throng. He also inspected the volunteer troops before the hotel, walking up, down and between the ranks. To-night he spends at Brockville.

ANNALS OF THE PRINCE AT BROCKVILLE.

BROCKVILLE, C. W., Sept. 3, 1860.

The Earl of Devon and some of the Prince's suite arrived here by the regular train this afternoon. They occupied a separate car, while the other were with

THE BRECKINRIDGE BARBECUE.

Assembled in the Hands of the Democracy—Unbrag of the Old Line Whigs—The Contest Between Breckinridge and Bell—The Union Ticket—Douglas' Strength—Personal Popularity of Breckinridge—Decides to Take the Stamp—Kentuckians Looking Up—The Points of Mr. Breckinridge's Fortcoming—Special Despatch to the New York Herald.

LEXINGTON, Ky., Sept. 3, 1860.

The Committee on Arrangements, of which John R. Wiley is Chairman, had just decided where the barbecue would be held. The Fair ground, half a mile out on Mulberry street, was considered the most desirable location, both on account of its proximity to the town and its excellent view of the river. It was, however, a long and tedious journey, where the speaker could be heard by a much larger audience than on level ground. The proprietors, however, a joint stock company, through their directors, refused all offers of the committee, for the reason that they did not wish the ground to be used for political purposes; and further, that it would interfere with their arrangements for the approaching fair to be held next week.

Their decision has given much umbrage to the friends of Mr. Breckinridge, who were willing to pay any price demanded, and consider that, being a public ground, it should be open to all parties. In answer to the first objection, they say that Mr. Clay on one occasion addressed a meeting there, and they hesitate not to allege that political feeling is at the bottom of the refusal.

Failing to obtain the Fair ground, the committee turned their attention to Ashland, made classic ground at the home of the gifted Henry Clay. This beautiful retreat, which the engraver, painter and photographer have made so familiar to the eyes of every American as to need no description, is situated about a mile and a half from the town; it is at present owned by Hon. James Clay, who, now a democrat, promptly met the wishes of the committee by granting the use of the woodland south of the house, the same where a barbecue was given to Henry Clay on his election to Congress in 1837. But, alas for him who attempts to please all. The old line Whigs take much offense at this arrangement. They look upon it as little short of sacrilege to permit a democratic gathering on a spot sacred to the memory of their great leader. I am informed that many who had a curiosity to hear Mr. Breckinridge refused to attend for this reason. As might be anticipated, political feeling runs high just at present, and on every corner I meet little groups discussing the prospects of Breckinridge and the Bell-Everett ticket.

The contest in this State will be between these parties, and the Douglas interest is only regarded as a how far it will influence the result between the others. In that view the contest is important; and the greater number with whom I have conversed think that Douglas' strength deduced from the democratic vote will throw the election into the hands of the Union party.

In the last gubernatorial election the united democracy beat the opposition by a majority of only one or ten thousand. Now, even the friends of Breckinridge acknowledge that Douglas can get twenty thousand votes in the State, principally from the border towns. The large defection from the democratic strength gives a majority to the Union party, who anticipate that the large opposition vote on the occasion will not only not be diminished, but will be increased in favor of Bell and Everett; for, say they, many men who, by reason of the protective principles of the opposition candidates, voted the democratic ticket, find in the division of the democratic party a good reason to return.

As a verification of what I stated in my last letter of the strength of the Union party in the eastern portion of this State, I give the result of a canvass made by a gentleman in the morning train from Lexington to Lexington—Bell, 42; Breckinridge, 31; Douglas, 4; Lincoln, 4. Too much reliance is not to be placed on such facts, of course, but they are an indication of which way the political wind blows.

Supporters of Mr. Breckinridge, who become more and more numerous and more energetic in the interior and southern counties, reckon upon a large accession to Mr. Breckinridge from the opposition ranks and many conversions from Douglas. The amount of Omate over McCarthy, which has done so much to weaken their prestige in other States, they regard as no just criticism. McCarthy, they say, was a young man, not well known, while Omate had been long known to the democratic party. The time in which to canvass was very short, and there were thousands of good Breckinridge men who either did not know McCarthy was in the field or failed to vote on that occasion. They count largely on the popularity of Mr. Breckinridge in rallying men from every side to his support, and certainly, from what I can see, no man was more blessed with an extensive personal friendship. They rally round him with an enthusiasm and ardor which augurs strongly in favor of the man who can inspire such devotion. Indeed, it is at his urgent solicitation that he has overcome his reluctance to take part in the Presidential canvass, and consented to speak. They consider such a course called for by the numerous and persistent attacks made upon him, and especially to refute the charge of disunion sentiments, which reflects not only upon himself, but upon the political organization that sustains him; for their wishes in this he has yielded, but he has not yet indicated a consent to the further request that he should appear personally in five or six principal districts of the State. They are confident that such a personal popularity and great force as a public speaker, that his appearance on the stump would insure his election beyond a doubt.

It is not the habit of Mr. Breckinridge to prepare his speeches beforehand. I can, however, gather from reliable sources that after explaining the reasons for his taking an active part in the Presidential canvass, he will deliver the general address against him, in reply to the charge of disunion, and having submitted to the office of President, he will make a comprehensive statement, showing that he owned the claims of Mr. Galt, never allowing his own name to come in competition with him, and that it was only after the disruption occurred he felt himself called upon by every obligation of honor and principle to accept the nomination. He will charge upon the Whig Convention that it stands forth prominently in history as having violated the fundamental principle of representation, and as not only void of the spirit of justice, but not even clothed with the forms of regularity. The charge that he signed a petition for the pardon of John Brown he will denounce as wholly untrue. As to the assertion that he did not support Cass and Butler in the canvass of 1856, he will show that he returned from Mexico about the middle of that canvass, ordered into Kentucky, and took passage ship west to his old home in Kentucky, where he was warmly welcomed by his friends. He will show that he was in Kentucky, was a Kentuckian, his old commander and friend, in regard to the rumor extensively circulated that he was in favor of the abolition of slavery in Kentucky, was an emancipationist, and voted for an emancipationist candidate in 1849, can only account for it by supposing that some honest people may possibly have confounded him with the Rev. Robert G. Breckinridge, in the same county. One of the most surprising charges to Mr. B. is, that he sympathizes with the principles and purposes of the Know Nothing organization. This he will refute by showing that he was almost the first person in the House of Representatives, in the Congress, who proclaimed his hostility to the order, and that when on his return to Kentucky, in the spring of 1856, after the adjournment of Congress, he found it had taken deep root in the State, he arrayed himself against it in many public speeches in various parts of the State. The representation that he is at any time vitiated the sentiment that he would make a political distinction between a person of his own religious belief and another, or between a native born and adopted citizen, by denouncing an utterly untrue. Then, as to the accusation that he and the organization he represents have abandoned the positions which they occupied in 1854 and 1856, upon the Territorial question, he will meet first, by showing that it is based upon reports of his speeches totally incorrect. He emphatically denies that he ever entertained or uttered the opinion that a Territorial Legislature possessed the power to exclude slave property pending the Territorial question.

THE PRINCE OF WALES.

MORE ENTHUSIASM AND CEREMONY.

THE FREEMASONS ON THEIR DIGNITY.

ANTICIPATED RIOT IN TORONTO

The Prince Slides Down Hill on a Raft.

Scenes at Night—A Canoe Torchlight Procession.

Special Despatches to the Herald.

OTTAWA, Sept. 3, 1860.

At eleven o'clock on Saturday morning the Prince of Wales left the Victoria Hotel, where he was staying, and proceeded to lay the foundation stone of the new Parliament building. Over the entrance to the grounds, which were enclosed, a handsome Gothic arch was erected. A gigantic crown was placed over the stone that was to be laid.

On the round open space there were tiers of seats containing several thousand spectators. The central space was reserved for the Prince and suite, and a few privileged persons, including the members of the press. The seats leading to the spot were lined with volunteers, heads of lumbermen in scarlet skirts, Orange societies from the country, mounted, and clad in Orange frocks, and heads of music.

The Prince and suite, the government officials, the architect, contractors, clerk of the work, etc., took positions around the stone. Rev. Dr. Adamson, Chaplain of the Legislative Council, offered up a prayer.

The stone is of beautiful white Canadian marble, with the simple inscription, "Laid by the Prince of Wales, September 1, 1860." Under the stone there is a hollow, in which is placed a bottle containing a parchment record of the ceremony, and a number of the coins of Great Britain and Canada.

When the mortar had been spread around the stone, the Prince gave the finishing touch to it with a silver trowel. The stone was then lowered to the place assigned for it, examined with the plumb and level, and pronounced "duly laid." The crowd then gave three rousing cheers for the Queen, three for the Prince, and three for the Governor General.

A deputation of a Masonic society of the State of New York were on hand to take part in the ceremony of laying the corner stone, and to the astonishment of all no Masons were present. It appears that the Duke of Newcastle and the Hon. John Rose refused the Masons the privilege of laying the stone, after the Prince, with their peculiar ornaments. The consequence was that the Masons unanimously refused to have anything to do with the affair.

As the Masons are very strong in Canada and in the House of Parliament a disturbance is expected, and a vote of censure will surely be passed by both houses during the present session.

It seems as if everywhere the Prince goes he does something to create a disturbance between religious, or parties of some other kind.

At Toronto the Orange Society intend creating an arch and appearing in the procession. The Roman Catholics hold a mass meeting on Thursday, and petitioned the Mayor to stop the procession. A riot is expected there, if nothing is done by either party.

The following is the Prince's reply to the Mayor's address, which, as the City Clerk carried it in his pocket, could not be read till the eve—

"I thank you sincerely for this address, and I request you to convey to the citizens whom you represent the expression of my gratitude for the very kind and cordial reception which I have received here, and the warm wishes which they have presented me. In this city, as in every other, I am about to lay the first stone of a building in which will be the deliberations of the Parliament of Canada will be held, and from which will emanate the laws which are to govern the great and free people of this province, and the civilization and progress of the continent, and the welfare of the people of the great empire of which this colony forms an integral and most important portion. I do not doubt that, with its increase of population, and the growth of its commerce, and the wealth of the country of which it is now the capital, and will justify the selection which has been made of this site for the seat of government.

The Prince took very much interest in the address, and his countenance being again followed by a crowd.

After dinner he went to the side of the Chaudiere Falls, where by three wooden inclined planes rafts are conveyed from Chaudiere Lake down to Ottawa river, a distance of sixty feet.

The Prince and suite embarked on a raft and went down the slide, the people shouting lustily.

Here an immense arch was constructed entirely of wood, without rail, and beautifully decorated. It was very high, unique and elegant. The Prince then entered a large and rowed down the river to see the regatta. There was a fine and spirited display of lumbermen's skill.

In the evening the whole city was beautifully illuminated. A large procession of canoes by torchlight took place on the river, and a band called the "Phrygians," dressed in the costume of different periods, like the Romans of Gaul, paraded through the town on horseback, bearing torches.

There is little to be recorded of the Prince's movements yesterday. He went to Christ Church, where he was crowded with people, though they hardly knew him in plain clothes. Thinking, no doubt, that he lives and sleeps in uniform. Each of the suite put a merriment on the place. The old custom newly died for joy, and the trustees of erecting a new church from the proceeds. No money was served out in Canada before.

After service the Prince and suite, descending their carriage, went back to the hotel, followed by a gang of boys, boys and women, commencing loudly at his appearance, much to the annoyance of the Prince.

He held dinner with a party of forty. Breakfast, the Prince, had great difficulty in getting provisions enough, and the Prince, being told that it would take half an hour to get dinner ready, and that an American could get it in a quarter of an hour if he pleased. I believe the Prince always breakfasts with a small party of four or five of the principal members of the suite.

In the afternoon the Prince drove with the Hon. Mr. McKay to his country seat where he took lunch. Mr. McKay is a large mill owner here. The carriage was followed by troops of police. The Duke of Newcastle and St. Germaine also walked out, and were followed by crowds.

The people seem to be all out of doors, riding, driving and walking about. Ladies and children were sitting along the road where the Prince passed, and the Victoria Hotel, where the Prince stopped, was surrounded all day by crowds, sitting opposite on the moors, intently watching the house.

The Prince left here at eight o'clock, in an open carriage, for the little village of Aylmer, on route for Kingston. He sat at the open window for an hour before starting, stared at by a large throng. He also inspected the volunteer troops before the hotel, walking up, down and between the ranks. To-night he spends at Brockville.

ANNALS OF THE PRINCE AT BROCKVILLE.

BROCKVILLE, C. W., Sept. 3, 1860.

The Earl of Devon and some of the Prince's suite arrived here by the regular train this afternoon. They occupied a separate car, while the other were with

NEWS FROM EUROPE.

Arrival of the City of Manchester Off Cape Race.

LANDING OF GARIBOLDI IN NAPLES.

REVOLUTION IN CALABRIA.